Reflection

In today's Gospel, John expresses concern that someone unbeknown to the disciples is casting out demons in Jesus' name. The fact that an unnamed, unfamiliar person is able to do this task implies that within this person, God's spirit is alive and active.

Jesus' response suggests that no one who claims Jesus' power will ever speak ill of him, and that no one has prerogatives over others. The grace and spirit of God is given and available to all — women, children Gentiles, and those who live on the margins, namely, the poor and outcasts. The reference to giving a cup of cold water to drink emphasizes the point that no service, however minimal, will go unnoticed or unrewarded.

The last part of the Gospel features a series of sayings. The phrase "little ones" could be a reference to children, the unauthorized exorcist, or any weaker member of the Christian community. The warning against causing one of the weaker or marginal members of the community to abandon faith takes the form of an ancient proverb.

The danger of causing others to lose their faith next shifts to warnings about losing one's own faith. The series of these sayings emphasizes the goal of entering into life or the reign of God, a goal that is so important that whatever would become a stumbling block at this goal, must be cast aside.

Thus, these Sunday readings invite listeners everywhere to reflect on the ways of God and the divine law. A call to embrace one's prophetic vocation goes forth, along with an example of how to live it out. With the reign of God at hand, the time has come to move forward with anyone who is working to bring about the healing and liberation of all.
